

CULTURED

Heading to Expo Chicago? Here Are 13 Must-See Shows Now on View in the Windy City

From a riot-inspired sculpture to a wall painted with the phrase "I Hate Business," artists in Chicago have a message they want you to hear.

If you're going to this year's Expo Chicago, make sure to make a stop at these shows by L train, Divvy, or (unlike New York) a reasonably priced Uber ride. The city is thriving with DIY spaces and longstanding galleries alike, an off-the-beaten-bicoastal-path treat for anyone swinging through Expo week. We've rounded up our favorite outposts showing an array of sculptures, prints, paintings, and... bicycles?

"Ethical Managers Make Their Own Rules"

Where: Bodenrader

When: Through May 2

Why It's Worth a Look: Three artists—Jessica Diamond, H el ene Fauquet, and Jason Hirata—offer work that, together, creates a display that at first glance seems rather empty. The middle of the gallery is entirely unoccupied, and instead, the works line the edges of the space in a distinctly taunting manner. Is this a gallery show, or a protest of one? "The exhibition supports the exhibition and vice versa, you know? I think it's a reflex," the gallery notes in its statement. "It's a gift to write something and say nothing, and vice versa. So much, so little, and so on. Does that mean what I think it does? I mean, it is mean."

Know Before You Go: The exhibition's fanciful title is derived from businessman Sir Adrian Cadbury's 1987 article with the same name for the Harvard Business Review, critiquing the writer's shallow recommendations for companies on how to run an ethical corporation.